Warning: unsafe to walk

DEATH TOLL OF PEDESTRIANS MOUNTS TO 23 IN S.J.; 13 ARE 60 OR OLDER

By Mark Ginner and Lisa Fernandez
Mercury Staff

It's been a deadly year to walk across the street in San Jose — especially for senior citizens.

In the past 12 months, 23 pedestrians have been struck by cars and killed, according to a Mercury News review of police department data. That's about double the average of about 10 deaths a year. In about two-thirds of the latest accidents, police say the pedestrian was at fault. And more than half of those killed were in their 60s or older.

Many senior citizens are alarmed, and now some are calling for changes, both in safety measures on San Jose streets and the behavior of their fellow walkers.

"Sometimes, seniors are the cause, thinking they can just walk across the street," said Rick Schwartz, 75, an active member of the city's club at the Cypress Senior Center in San Jose. "But now, with these deaths, we have to start respecting our age. We're not 20 anymore. Heck, we're not 50 anymore. Our eyesight isn't as good, our legs aren't as good. We've got to walk to the end of the block to make it to the crosswalk."

Seniors in the South Bay are buzzing about the recent deaths of four older people killed in late summer, including two church friends out for an evening stroll on the border of Santa Clara and San Jose, and a grandmother returning home from senior center shopping. All three women were in their 70s.

Here are the number of pedestrians who died in San Jose annually since 2003. List of pedestrian death locations at www.mercurynews.com.
